420704-71

with the scoters nearby.

Wilsonia pusilla chryseola. on top of the point. This bird which always seems quite silent and retiring to me evidently nest along the coast in some numbers - how many I could not say.

Nannus hiemalis pacificus. I never did see this little fellow in the heavy undergrowth he frequented, but his amazing song, such a tune without a breath, was very common in the woods.

Gavia arctica pacifica. (immature) seemed very content with a limited feeding range on Elk Creek and in same. Was very reticant of close approach, in fact it did not once do a real crash dive to my knowledge. It would occasionally submerge lazily and swim around for awhile, finally using again to continue swimming along slowly with its head and neck occasionally going under the water, apparently feeding but I dont know what on. One sunday morning I saw him rise and stretch his wings as ducks do, whipping them energetically for just a moment and then subsiding on the water again contented. I don't know when I've had such a good time watching a bird.

Agelaius phaeniceus caurinus. One pair nesting on the island in Elk Creek by the bridge. Had little difficulty in locating the nest which contained 3 young birds. The male bird never was brave enough to approach more closely than 10 feet, flying, while the female would scold at a distance of 6 or 7 feet.

Petrochelidon albifrons albifrons. Fairly numerous by the creek where they were also continually gathering mud for nest building.

Larus delawarensis. One immature (2 years) bird standing in the surf in the evening as we walked toward Chapman Point as the sun set.

Puffinus griseus } The had been washed up on the Diomedea nigripes } beach by the surf about 20 feet from each other, a most amazing coincident to me. The identification is quite positive to me. The albatross had the distinct white face, slightly whitish rump and black feet. I was surprised at the birds size and to even find the one that I was more or less stunned with good luck the remainder of the evening. Such a thing could only happen through great good fortune. It would be