Casablanca so we can momentarily mention something about F.D.R's vacationing grounds. You will notice that the discussion is purposely controlled in the past tense for sake of security and also only one position disclosed at any one setting.

Casablanca, or any other place that could be mentioned, is over-publicised and does not even suggest the romantic Casablanca as pratrayed by commentators or glorified in the movies. The shows I see over here, shows that depict the life and customs of its people (American films made at Hollywood) are a far cry of the true and intrensic conditions that exist and this can be said as a result of a most direct comparison. I have noticed this to be particularly true in the case of advertisment of Chamber of Commerce and local societies in their description of ordinary features and sites of their sections of country. you have a mental picture of the thing they describe but when you actually see those same objects you become slightly disappointed. It probably is an inate condition of man to always put in a few extra good words; probably wasn't even intentional. Could we ever excuse California ☺. Then again there are certain instances when such overwhelming spectacles and phenomena like the grandcanyon or cedar breaks will defy being put to discription and in this case the publicity is deeply endurating. Most of the natural scenic features I have seen so far belonging to the latter catagory while many other observations readily fall into the former. In review again (my poor manner of emphasizing) somethings fall short of their descriptions while others do not receive their proper treatment.

my thoughts are as confusing as Casablanca but now back again to the orignal theme. It is a peculiar thing but the people and Arabian native impress me more than their surroundings, possibly because of the factor of sympathy which is so strong that it outweights all other features or considerations. Something is certainly putting on the brakes
