Suppose you were learning to read and write in Greek or any language in which the writing is absolutely different than English. You would first have to learn to draw (not write) each letter, which would be similar to "studying" in radio; and then you would have to learn to recognize each letter, written by another person, which would be similar to "receiving" in radio.

If this is too big a strain on your imagination, then just consider how a 1-B pupil learns to read
