

Provo, Utah. Feb. 5, 1937 approx. date, from Provo Herald.

Provo Hikers Camp Near Twin Peaks; Zero Weather, Only 2 Pounds Bedding

Over 10,000 feet up in the mountains, zero weather, and only two pounds of bedding. What would you do, if it were you?

Sid Boyle says it was the greatest camping trip he's ever had. "Plenty of fun, and not the least bit cold," he said upon his return recently from a camping trip to Twin Peaks where he was accompanied by James Bee. Sid is a student of Brigham Young university.

"We just went for the fun and the skiing. The skiing was the best I've found any place in the state. The snow was just right and East Peak offers excellent opportunities for slaloming. Of course, we didn't have any flags but we enjoyed the slope immensely."

He says Mr. Bee was responsible for their not being cold despite the small amount of bedding. Mr. Bee who is an expert winter camper, has found that the best way to keep warm is by sleeping in light bedding in a lightweight tent heated with a small wood-burning stove.

Some of the most beautiful views from the top of East Peak are to be had at sunrise and sunset. From the top, several mountain ranges, including Mount Nebo to the south are plainly seen. No more gorgeous sunsets and sunrises are to be found anyplace, in their opinions. One peculiar thing they noticed was that all the shadows are a vivid blue.

"The snow was well over eight feet deep," declared Mr. Boyle, "and just right for skiing. If only it were more accessible, there would be no better spot in Utah for skiing and slaloming than East Peak."