

BOTANICAL

Journal of the

Botanical Society of America

The Botanical Society of America was organized in 1890, and since that time has been engaged in the publication of a journal devoted to the advancement of botanical science. The journal is published quarterly, and contains original researches, reviews, and other papers of interest to the botanical community. The Society is composed of members from all over the world, and its meetings are held annually in different parts of the United States. The journal is one of the most important and influential in the field of botany, and its contents are widely read and cited by botanists everywhere.
