

CAUTIONARY REMARKS

TO THE READER

It is the duty of the author to inform the reader of the nature and extent of the work, and to caution him against any misapprehension or error.

The first part of the work is devoted to a general survey of the subject, and to a statement of the objects and aims of the author. It is intended to give the reader a clear and concise view of the whole, and to prepare him for the more detailed and extensive treatment which follows.

The second part of the work is devoted to a detailed and extensive treatment of the subject, and is intended to give the reader a full and complete view of the whole. It is divided into several chapters, each of which is devoted to a particular branch of the subject, and is intended to give the reader a full and complete view of the whole.

The third part of the work is devoted to a summary of the whole, and to a statement of the conclusions which have been reached. It is intended to give the reader a clear and concise view of the whole, and to prepare him for the more detailed and extensive treatment which follows.
