

DENDROCTYX LEUCOPHYA, Gmel.

White-bellied Woodpecker.

1811. [illegible]

This bird is found in the mountains of the Sierra Nevada, and is common in the pine forests.

It is a very active bird, and is often seen climbing the trunks of the trees.

The male has a black cap, and the female has a white cap.

The young are born in the month of May, and are fed by the parents.

The bird is very common in the mountains, and is often seen in the pine forests.

It is a very active bird, and is often seen climbing the trunks of the trees.

The male has a black cap, and the female has a white cap.

The young are born in the month of May, and are fed by the parents.

The bird is very common in the mountains, and is often seen in the pine forests.

It is a very active bird, and is often seen climbing the trunks of the trees.

The male has a black cap, and the female has a white cap.

The young are born in the month of May, and are fed by the parents.

The bird is very common in the mountains, and is often seen in the pine forests.

It is a very active bird, and is often seen climbing the trunks of the trees.

The male has a black cap, and the female has a white cap.

The young are born in the month of May, and are fed by the parents.

The bird is very common in the mountains, and is often seen in the pine forests.