

ARTICLE XXXV

Of the Privileges of the Clergy

The rights of the clergy are preserved in all things as they were in the time of the first constitution. They are not to be taken away without their consent. They are not to be taxed in any manner without their consent. They are not to be imprisoned without their consent. They are not to be tried in any court but their own. They are not to be punished in any manner but their own. They are not to be deprived of any of their rights without their consent. They are not to be deprived of any of their property without their consent. They are not to be deprived of any of their freedom without their consent. They are not to be deprived of any of their rights without their consent. They are not to be deprived of any of their property without their consent. They are not to be deprived of any of their freedom without their consent.