

The amount of your monthly disability insurance payment will depend on your average monthly earnings as shown in your social security record. It will be the same as the amount of the old-age insurance benefit you would get if you were already 65. See table on page 31 giving examples of monthly disability benefits.

Disability insurance benefits are not paid in addition to any dependents or survivors insurance benefits which may be payable to you under the social security law. If you become entitled to more than one of these benefits at the same time, the amount will ordinarily be equal to the largest of the benefits. However, a person who becomes entitled to another type of social security benefit before age 65 cannot later become entitled to a disability benefit even if the disability benefit would be higher than the other benefit.

Benefits for Dependents of Disabled Workers

While you are receiving disability insurance benefits, dependents benefits may be paid to certain members of your family—just as in the case of a retired worker.

Payments can be made to any of your children who are under age 18, or who have been totally disabled since before they reached 18 years of age. (See page 20.)

Your wife, regardless of her age, can be paid benefits if she has in her care children who are eligible for these dependents benefits.

If you have no child eligible for benefits, your wife may qualify for payments when she reaches age 62. (The dependent husband of a disabled woman worker may qualify for husband's benefits at age 62.)

If you are receiving disability insurance benefits and one of your eligible dependents earns more than $1,200 in a year, he or she may not be due some of his or her payments.
