Dear Dr. Allen:

It seems that I always write to you when I have a problem. The present one concerns the right arm of one of our prospective ball players, Joe Gullledge, by name. Joe hurt his arm several years ago and, I believe, partially through improper care on the part of certain trainers, now has a condition which apparently needs some really expert care. Joe is one of several young ball players in our employ who have left professional baseball with the thought of starting to work to build themselves a future in aircraft.

I hesitate to write you concerning this case, because I know the demands on your time, but I thought if it were possible, it would be very much appreciated if an opportunity could be secured for you to look at Joe's arm. It appears to be a quite unusual injury in that it is behind the shoulder joint (I am trying to think of the name of the muscles, but I am afraid my Anatomy has slipped away from me). Any suggestions which you may have as a possibility of helping us with this problem will be very much appreciated.

Please give my regards to the folks at the gym.

Best personal regards,

George
