am one of them I am bold enough to address this letter to you. In the first place you spoke of recent research studies but did not indicate the names of the studies nor the men who carried them out. Neither did you give the details of the techniques nor the specific results.

Several people have read your article and have come to me for my opinion of the present situation. It is especially interesting since last fall I had reported from your very excellent address delivered to the coaches of north western Ohio and they have remembered your name as one who is an authority.

I have at hand a number of facts that seem to indicate that the oft repeated criticism of this fast game is unfounded. However I have always had a suspicion that there may be some truth in the allegation. If you are working for changes that will correct a fault in one of America's most popular games you may expect a large measure of support from the large group of high school coaches when they are informed as to the facts relating to the situation.

In Ohio we have just been asked to grant funds for a study on this situation. I would be glad to pay the cost of securing any information you now have on the matter. I would much prefer that we who are the coaches and promoters of this sport should be the first to offer the changes that are wise and good for the sport. As for me I am not interested in making it a static game in any way but I am determined that I shall do my little bit toward making it the game that will render the greatest possible good toward the physical, mental, and social welfare of the participants.

Yours, for better basketball
