THE first Teachers' Agency was established in Philadelphia in 1835, before the first Normal School.

There are now about 150 Agencies—filling a useful niche in our educational program.

The National Association of Teachers' Agencies, with more than 50 members, was founded in 1914. Member agencies are required to subscribe to and live up to a strict code of ethics.

Member agencies of the National Association are recommended by College and University placement officers to their students and graduates.

Teachers' Agencies have grown up with and have helped to develop the educational standards of today.

Few factors in the field of education have done more to combat sectionalism within the United States—this has been done by finding the right teacher for a given position regardless of the distance between the two.
