surveys show them to be adequate and sufficient. See, for example, America's Capacity to Produce, published in 1934 by The Brookings Institution, Washington, D. C., and the findings of the National Survey of Potential Product Capacity, published in 1935 by the Viking Press, New York.

Will the nation's resources be so utilized? That will depend upon public demand, based on knowledge of America's abundance and arising from the traditional American conceptions of public welfare, individual security, and educational opportunity.

America has three choices: (1) to go forward to higher standards of education and of living; (2) to go backward to lower standards; (3) to retain the unsatisfactory standards which came to characterize the years of the depression.

Knowledge of past progress in our nation reveals the energy, the resource-fulness, and the sense of justice of the American people. It is reasonable to believe that these virtues, responsible for our national greatness, will carry the nation forward to higher standards.
