

IX. 1. A three-game trip would probably cover the greater part of a week's time. The first and foremost responsibility of the coach not only to his players as students but to the school would be to see that they studied while on the trip.

2. Travelling is hard and tiring. The best accommodations available should be procured for the team. The coach should see to it that meals are eaten regularly.

3. Sight-seeing trips in strange cities are wonderful recreation for a team and one that all enjoy.

4. The serious business of basketball playing is not to be forgotten. The coach should see to it that an auditorium for short practice sessions be provided.

5. Players should be allowed to visit relatives on trips if such a visit will not inconvenience the team or interrupt the trip. The team and trip come first. If a visit with relatives can be arranged that is fine and good.

X. The benefits a coach might receive from his association with young men would be numerous. The joy or pleasure of knowing that you have taken a squad of boys, trained them to a point of excellence, taught them the game of basketball, taught them to live, work and play together and the thought
