

1 H Doubtless the center jump did entail too much strain upon the two jumping
 2 centers. The rotation of the center jump after each goal would entirely
 3 eliminate this problem. Too, these pauses in the game would afford breathing 4 spells for both the spectators and players. The administration of the 5 rotation of the center jump should be as efficient as is the enforcement 6 of the batting order in baseball. Before the game began, the respective 7 coaches would give to the score-keeper the order in which their players
 8 were to jump -- just as the batting order is handled in baseball. Sub-9 stitutes coming in would follow the jumping order of their predecessors.

 Insert ~~II~~ here - new paragraph.*

10 "Leave the rules alone" cry ^{some} ~~the~~ coaches. Baseball would still be "One 11 Old Cat" if intelligent rule~~m~~akers, through numerous wise revisions, had 12 not developed it into its present magnificent game. Baseball is 100 years
 13 old. Basketball is but one-half of that. Whether or not basketball as a 14 sport lives to see the century mark depends largely upon intelligent rules 15 revisions which will at every turn protect the permanent well-being of its 16 participants.

17 Many of the outstanding ^{college} coaches of the nation opposed the elimination of the 18 center jump. Now, after four years, we find them still wanting the center jump

X

XI

XII