

3. There is a certain amount of transfer, concomitant learnings, that results from moral training.
4. Moral training in addition to providing for some transfer also lays a base, from which transfer can take place.
5. Thru situations, aspects of moral education can be taught indirectly to the boy.

Moral Education can be effectively taught thru physical education if it is properly directed. Situations can arise and by skillful direction on the part of the coach, the boy unknown to himself has developed habits of moral education that mores deem essential.

1. There are habits of moral behavior that are acquired in athletics that are essential for future life.
2. An individual who has received the right kind of moral teaching thru athletics becomes an economic and social asset to the community.
3. He has acquired indispensable virtues that distinguish between mediocre and outstanding personalities.
4. The acquisition of such habits as fair play, courage and cleanliness.
5. Teachers on a faculty can do a great deal in moral education if they would cooperate, because moral habits overlap into many fields of education.
6. A boy who has not the basic foundation of moral training is like a ship without a rudder, who eternally asks the question, "Whither am I going?"
