

graduate career. He dresses immaculately- he generally has money - yet he obviously does little work to earn it. "Say it with touchdowns."

After the years of competitive eligibility are over he must crash the line of human endeavor out in the cold business and professional world. He must of necessity start at a low salary as an apprentice. Too much attention and newspaper publicity have made him feel that he is a "big shot". The world owes him a living because heretofore friends and alumni have been generous in providing him with credit, cash and tutors along the social and academic pathway.

This pseudo-athletic marvel obtained his prominence and earning power through that driving piston like pair of legs that stretched across the gridiron to the goal line. The brain now will not earn as much as brawn - so at the end of his college career he turns to the most lucrative activity that is left to him, professional football.

It is a sad commentary on education and athletics, that a boy would go to college four years to learn to be a professional football player. A college man's curve of earning power should not show a downward decent until long past sixty - yet statistics show that the average professional football player's durability does not last ten years.
