Dear Phog:

I returned this morning to find your letter saying that you had filled your position, and also that you were on your way East. I surely hope you come by this way and stop for a visit.

It is pretty difficult to say just whom you can contact in New York this time of the year, other than people you have mentioned. Fritz Maroney at Teachers College has, I believe, had the widest experience of any of them, and discounting his enthusiasm, I would say his opinions were worth having. He is an associate of Williams and, as indicated, has had a wide and varied experience. He has also reached that point in life when he is apt to be a little philosophical, and for that reason his opinions should really be worth while.

James Edward Rogers, if you can reach him in New York City (National Physical Education Service, 315 Fourth Ave.,) would be very much worth while spending some time with. While he didn't major in physical education work in college, he is such a highly intelligent fellow and has had such a variety of experience, that he certainly would be worth contacting and talking to.

I don't know whether I covered this in previous correspondence - the question of the two fields, health education and physical education. It wasn't very long ago when the field of physical education seemed in a fair way of being completely dominated by those people in the profession who were not well trained in physical education techniques and procedures, who thought that "health education" was better terminology, and who also thought that since there was no one trained in the field of health education that they could start there, even with the field.
