

If a G-man should investigate the Big Six Conference or any other honorable, long-established conference, on obeying the present rules of the conference as they are now printed, his findings would cause much panic. The athletic situation is a mess. Conferences are printing one rule, but actually obeying another. This is comparable to the present international situation, when the world powers say we must be prepared, we must protect ourselves against the outlaws.

When Primo Carnera, the great Italian hulk, won the world's heavyweight championship, a little Jewish boy who was his shadow and hero-worshiper, followed him everywhere. When Carnera left New York on the Italian steamer, the Roma, the little Jewish boy became a stowaway. Carnera was returning to his native home in Italy. He was lionized on his triumphal return to Italy; the women of his little seaside home knitted him the most gorgeous, multicolored shawl that the deft hands of Italian women could weave. When Carnera returned to America the little Jewish boy became a stowaway on the return trip, but as soon as the purser was out of sight, the little Hebrew slipped from his hiding place and camped along beside Carnera who gigantic form was stretched out in a deck chair. As the evening wore on and the atmosphere became cooler, Carnera used this beautiful throw that the women of Italy had made him to protect himself from the chill air. The churning of the waves soon rocked him to sleep. The little Jewish boy, keeping a close watch over Carnera, soon had an impulsive desire to rush to the rail to feed the fishes. In his haste to scurry to the rail, he tripped over Carnera, and all of his gastronomic contents were spilled over Carnera and his shawl. The awakened and surprised Carnera looked at the mess and glowered on the little shaking, frightened and sick Jewish boy. But true to his traditional quick thinking, the little fellow gulped a couple of times, and then said, "Now, sir, Mr. Carnera, you will feel a lot better."

Some conferences pay specialists whose business it is to keep some nervous and athletic sick stomachs from regurgitating in public.

The colleges should take a page from the State of New York in their educational policy in regard to the high schools. All of the activities of the high
