Dear Pat:

Blanche left for home last evening after a very delightful visit of a few days as far as I am concerned, and I think she ~~also~~ enjoyed it. What would have made us still happier would have been your presence. I never knew why the Lord made Job to suffer as he did, because the Good Book tells us that he had been a righteous man, but whatever the occasion for his affliction he finally came through with good health and an abundance of good friends and property. I don't believe old ~~W~~ister Job took things any more stoically than you have. You have been a wonder to us all, and nothing could delight us more than your early recovery.

You are getting into the granddaddy class rather rapidly. Two already here and one in the offing. I love little Wayne dearly as I have always loved his mother, and I am sure I shall be equally fond of Owen, ~~and~~ and the little one to arrive later to Marilyn.

If there is anything that I could do for you at any time you know verywell I shall be happy to do it. Please give my regards to your mother, Mrs. Maloney, when you see her.

Lovingly yours,
