

The progress of the human race was delayed for centuries, by the pride, jealousy, and inferiority-complex of man.

When man wrested the leadership of the family from woman, he left her the work, while he did the hunting and fighting, and Presto his occupation became the more honorable.

No nation is better or stronger than its women, and to woman has fallen privation, hardship, and suffering.

Years ago in talking with an educated Hindu, I asked him if there had ever been a time when the Hindus had been a military and dominant nation, and he said there was no record of such leadership.

We laugh at the story of the effeminate man, who, when asked why he was that way, responded, "That's easy, my mother was a woman."

This answer embraced more wisdom than that of priest and potentates, who for milleniums, not only kept from womankind the right of education and advancement,
