

at Woburn, must have gone someplace. As four of his brothers were in King Phillip's war, it is more than likely that William of Woburn heard of the greater prospect for success in the Connecticut Valley and went there, never to return to Woburn.

As it was a good many years later before a postal system was established and there were no railroads, few well traveled dirt roads, and the people in general were too poor to travel - people who left home seldom returned.

While we can't use this man from Woburn as being definitely the first on our list, I think the probabilities indicate the close relationship we have inferred.