The admonitions (saide they) of the Court have always bene as vsefull as they (the) censured therof; And though Her Ma^tie heir day of merrie had freed these Lords and gentlemen, yet let others take notice how in the like manner to demeane themselves, and that they maie see, although the matter were bene, there had not bine an end of prosecution. And since the opinions of the graue Iudges goe with the, that the Comon lawe can take gold of suche offendes, though there were not statute in that case prouided; for of the meanest man can haue an action of case for defamation, shall not they bringe? There is a statute named theire That of vsing words whereby a mutinie may arise to the ouerthrowe of the State) but whereby, disorder or occasion of disorde may arise to the disturbance. Now of this paper that carries in the bosome of it, not sparkes of light disagreemaide, but flames of daungerous sedition, of this he receiued and diuulged, and that by copies and communication, who confesseth not but that the reward of punishment longe be proportionable both to the nature of the offence, and the waight it woulde necessarilie vnlesse preuented, bringe with it verie greate. Owre sentence had it bine rejected or discovered, but it was so farr from beinge disclaymed, as it was tooke vpp and mayntained. And then stronge enough to goe (almost without hands) beinge gott abroade, and is left to the free interpretation of all that shall receiue it; I confesse they may themselues well themselues, but they finde not others to thinke soe with them. Wherof of these Lords receiued this paper onlie as a matter of novelties, yet doe we not knowe what consequented maie prove daungerous from a mysticke tonge not accompayned with malice

The Lord Keeper thought in like maner with the Lord Chiefe Iustice and indeed only repeated what the former had spoken sayd that not Her Ma^tie hime pleased to prevent their censure with a pardon the defendes had bine deeplie adiudged and that the Comon lawe without the statute coulde haue punished.

Whereupon the Attorney craued leaue of the Court to moue one thinge vnto they woulde bee pleased to impe some Antidote with mercie; for Her Ma^tie vnto them
